ATTACHMENT #2STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The houses at 630, 634, 636, 637, 640, 641, 646, 662, and 712 Portland Street are all included in the pie-shaped neighborhood of Ridgely's Delight. The neighborhood has been approved for city and state historic designation and is in the process of applying for National Historic designation. "The charming name is derived from a plantation owned by Charles Ridgely. Ridgely acquired the estate as dowry from his wife, Rebecca, the daughter of General John Eager Howard. Ridgely combined that property with another in 1732, known as Brotherly Love, and named it Ridgely's Delight." Since its beginnings, Ridgely's Delight has enjoyed a colorful history. Legends abound about its past, including one that George Washington stopped at one of the homes to rest while nursing an injured arm.

"As the community developed, the gradual change in architectural style of the houses reflected the change in the economic status of its residents."

"In the early 19th century the small, cozy Federal-style houses were inhabited by the poorer crafts people, the first settlers." The nine (9) houses on Portland Street fall into this category. "Later on, in the latter part of the century when the affluent professionals moved in, the architecture gradually transformed to ornate Italianate rowhouses. In any case, attempts were made to retain an harmonious atmosphere."

"For the most part, the two or two-and-a-half story Federal houses appear mainly on the smaller streets (Portland Street) and alleys and the Italianate style is more coomonly seen on major streets."

In 1973 the Ridgely's Delight Association was formed to save the Babe Ruth House at 216 Emory Street, which is across the five (5) foot alley from 630 Portland Street.

We feel that all nine (9) houses are representative of those houses built by the first settlers and crafts people. They form a part of a very pleasant 19th century streetscape. Simple brick facades, wood or brick lintels, wood steps, 6 over 6 windows, coal scuttles, basement access doors, chimneys, and simple brick cornices characterize these small homes of some of Baltimore's first settlers.
